THE EFFECT OF OUR LIVING SPACE ON THE QUALITY OF LIFE.

The future generation of human kind is predicted to be extremely sensitive to energies influenced by architectural forms, construction and materials. “PranaHome” is an attempt, inspired by Grand Master Choa Kok Sui’s Feng Shui course to study the effect of architecture and interior design on the human life and lifestyle.

At first PranaHome will start with explaining how our living space can influence our health and well being; then it will move on introduce some tips and practical steps that can totally change our homes into a space we cannot get enough of.

There are many approaches to architecture design presented by great philosophers and thinkers throughout history which portrays different faces of dwelling space from being a “place of the soul” to a “machine for living.” Besides such theories which is often the view of an individual towards the existence of the house, the very essence of dwelling architecture has been even discussed by ancient cultures as early as 6000 BC through religious scriptures and textbooks such as Rig Vedas which shows the importance of this piece of architecture in the life of its inhabitants.

According to Rig Veda, architecture of the ancient times was closely associated with religion. Considering architecture as a religious act basically refers to the respect that the traditional man has shown to nature. In the Upanishads which are based on Vedas, four essential theories are described as the basic principles of the universe which should also be applied in the construction of any piece of architecture summarized as:

- the laws of nature are the source of order and harmony in the universe,
- every being in nature is animated,
- all beings are interconnected, and
- originated from a supreme creative energy. M. Cox & Eden Karn
